Since mid-day he had been watching the road intently. His mind was not at rest. Seeing some woodcutters returning home, bent under the weight of the bundles of wood, Sheku went up to them and said, 'Did you run into a young man on the way?' One of them replied, 'I saw some cowherds playing hide and seek. I wouldn't know if one of them was yours.'

'Well, he's not a cowherd, but a smart lad dressed in a white shirt and trousers.' But by the time he had said this, the woodcutters had walked away.

Sheku grew more anxious. He prepared himself to walk up to the outskirts of the village to take a look. He slipped his chappals onto his feet and set out.

'I had asked him to get back before it was dark, but there's no sign of him. He must have stayed there,' Sheku muttered to himself. As he walked ahead, he ran into Nama Bangar who was returning home with his cattle. Seeing Sheku he asked, 'Well, old man, where are you off to, at a time like this?'
